A recent Washington dispatch says: Dispatches, dated April 7th. have been received from Col. D. S. Stanley, of the 22d Infantry, commanding at Fort Sully, Dakota, mentioning that three weeks previous to the date of the report there came to the agency, near the Big Cheyenne, about one hnndred lodges under the leadership of "The Spotted Eagle," the head and independent Indians, and soldier of the Sans Ares. The chief has been a big man among his people for about eighteen months, having won his distinction from having led the war party which killed all of a party of twenty Crow warriors last year. He is now suffering from a lung wound received from the Crows. The party came from the Rosebud, near its junction with the Yellowstone, their object being to trade and return to their country. The Spotted Eagle refused to take rations or any presents while at the agency, but was not disinclined to talk, and was well behaved and orderly in all his dealings with the traders and other white men. He requested Col. Stanley to hold a council, and a big talk was had with him, the agent and officers at Big Cheyenne being present. He appeared to be very well informed, and knew all about the threatened invasion of the Black Hills, but did not allude much to it, as he stated he had been told the Great Father at Washington would prevent occupation of that country by white men. He objected to the telegraph line terminating at Fort Sully, and spoke of the Northern Pacific Railroad and the intention of running it through his country. Neither himself nor any Sioux authorized for D his people had consented to this, and they never would listen to any proposition to this effect. He would fight the railroad people as long as he lived; would fear up the track and kill its builders. Upon its being stated that the road would be built despite his opposition, and that such a course as he proposed would bring ruin said the driving off of the buffale was death to his race, and he would fight knowing he would be beaten. Col. Stanley gives the above as the sentiment of a young chief of undoubted influence. He advises that when the railroad work crosses the Missouri, we must look for Sioux hostilities. He does not believe that negotiation can do anything with these wild thinks the only safety and security against a Sioux war is to guard the progress of the railroad west of the Missouri, with a force so large as to intimidate the Indians, In the same council alluded to in this dispatch, other Indians spoke defiantly and very impertinently. Spotted Eagle talked very calmly, without passion.

GRAND Pow-pow .- The Territorial Enterprise says: "The Red Men of Carson City and other places in Nevada, with invited guests, will hold a grand pow-wow at the Bowers' mansion, at Washoe Lake, Saturday, May 11th. It will be a sort of half-way picnic affair, and is to be kept up, we believe, two or three days. A buffalo hunt will be one among the many diversions planned. Half a dozen wild buffaloes will be brought in from the plains and turned loose in Washoe valley, when the Red Men will turn themselves loose after them, the "squaws" watching the hunt from the observatory of the Bowers' mansion through telescopes."
